The utility of RET testing in a hereditary tumor syndrome with the potential for germline tumor progression, retinitis pigmentosa, and early age-related hearing loss. The clinical utility of RET testing in hereditary retinopathies with the potential for germline RET mutation was evaluated. In a cohort of 18 patients from 13 families with incomplete penetrance of the syndrome, the risk of developing malignancy was assessed. We performed a basic RET screening that included the most important known recurrent RET mutations and followed with a full RET testing that included the complete mutation spectrum and a single nucleotide polymorphism array. The occurrence of malignancy was low in our cohort. The prevalence of malignancy was 2.8% in a cohort of 152 familial retinopathies (n = 18/152). Four of these cancers were ocular (2 colon cancers, 1 right lens capsule cancer, 1 orbital retinoblastoma). Germline RET mutation was found in a cancer patient with no significant clinical manifestations. The incidence of malignancy in our cohort was lower than the rate reported in hereditary retinopathies. Four types of cancer (colon, right lens capsule, orbital retinoblastoma, and cutaneous melanoma) were reported, whereas the other described types of cancer were not observed. Clinicians need to be aware that malignancy can occur in retinopathies with the potential for germline RET mutation. RET mutation analysis should be performed if the diagnosis is not certain, if it is uncertain whether a patient is at risk for germline mutation, or if the family history is incomplete.
