Why safe-injection sites would have a big impact on Canada's opioid crisis Written by | May 28, 2018 SHARE safe injection sites As this week's Meth Forum brought sobering insights into the deadly effects of fentanyl and other illicit drugs, researchers again grappled with a damning reality that has long vexed them: Canada's current system for responding to opioid overdoses is a failure. Last week, the head of the health department's overdose prevention site at Vancouver's Granville Street Public Space said he's optimistic that funding for supervised-injection services will soon be included in the federal government's budget. "I think that's the best guess that we have today," Dr. Annemarie Cusimano said. The Vancouver site has been operating since May 2017. It's staffed 24 hours a day, seven days a week, by nurse practitioners, physicians, social workers and health workers, who provide non-judgmental, integrated care for people who are experiencing an overdose or emerging from a substance use disorder. More than 3,000 people have successfully used the site in its first year. In a similar way, Ontario has provided the field with a much-needed reality check, in the form of a report from the country's poison-control centre in Toronto. The
