In fact, chances are that you've never even been to that site before. However, that page has a few serious problems: It looks like crap. It takes a long time to load. You can never get back to it quickly. When you came back to the site you could spend hours searching for something or even wasting a day just browsing around on an aimlessly. Fortunately, there is a solution to all of these problems. It's called Cache. What is Cache? Cache is a service that stores a website on your computer. Once the web server of the website has been processed by the server you visit the cached site rather than the live one. By storing it on your computer, you are given two benefits. First, the load time of the site is greatly reduced, as the cached copy of the site is ready to be loaded when you are. Second, you will be able to visit the site again and again without ever having to return to the original site. Why you want to do this Cache improves website load time, as well as gives you the ability to visit the website again and again without ever having to leave the page. Let's quickly look at the effect of caching on a typical website. If we use the Returnpath Media Traffic Lab as an example, we see that the page seems to load very slowly. Now, with cache on, the entire site loads much faster. How long can we expect a page to take to load? A little less than half the time. The page loads pretty quickly for us, but not exactly fast! So, why not just use a web proxy to do all of your web browsing? There are a few downsides to that. Web proxies require manual intervention. They have a very limited cache. They don't work automatically. None of those are really bad if you b7e8fd5c8
