(Photo by The Sports Xchange via Getty Images) By Graham Stark mlb.com There's that old New England saying, "When the teacher is tired, the students are tired." So it's apt that the Kansas City Royals experienced some weary days when it came to finishing games in the postseason. The Royals turned in a tight, five-run, ninth-inning rally in Game 4 of the AL Championship Series to back their way to the World Series on Thursday, but that win in the series finale was not smooth. There were long stretches of the Royals' postseason run when the club's inability to secure a win sparked frustration among players and fans alike. They also experienced the impact that the postseason can have on a player's body, as well as a manager's in. As this edition of The Post-Dispatch Royals Podcast shows, that frustration came to a head late in the regular season, when some players in the clubhouse realized the Royals could play hard yet still not emerge with a victory. "I think once this year started and we started losing games that we did start losing games, not that we would necessarily be upset about it but there was a moment where we were like, 'Let's go out and compete like we do everyday but we can't always win games," outfielder Jarrod Dyson said. "We're not a bunch of spoiled kids that we can go out there and win games every night. "I think that being like that and losing and going through that, we're going to be more responsible in do

I went to his bedroom, to wake him, but he would not answer. He was lying on the floor. I gently touched him and he came to. Gently, slowly, as if this were an operation, I helped him to sit up. He looked at me astonished. "Man, do you see what time it is? You will have to get up and go home. What do you say?" He did not answer me, but he got up and dressed. He put his coat on and came to me. Once outside, he did not look at me anymore. He began to say just five words,
