You might be thinking: "Who cares about an unused asset, especially if the market is paying a premium to buy something that is in good condition and going to be used?" This makes sense, to an extent. But it's important to remember the kind of customer you want to attract is the investor. No one gives a rip about having a great house in the middle of an ugly neighborhood — it's going to be a waste of time and money. You want to attract the kind of client that will make a difference to your financial future. So if you are looking to attract investors, make sure your home looks like it is going to be more valuable. What should you do? Again, this is a really personal choice. You could get every possible remodel done and sell it as soon as possible. You could take some time to read books and seminars on the topic, as I outlined here. You could hire an out-of-work house painter and spend thousands of dollars to have a fantasy kitchen. Or you could decide to be smart about it. So what do I think is the most appropriate strategy? I think about this question every day and all my thoughts about it make sense to me. I think the best thing to do is to use what we know and what we think is going to work. Here are the three key things I think we know work: Buy in the right location. Decide to be more selective. Make sure you price competitively. I always advise clients to aim for the lowest possible price. If we're looking to earn $250,000/year by selling our home, then we need to realize that we should aim for $175,000 — not $225,000 — not $225,000 — not $225,000/year. I' Occ13bf012
