Cellulases, also known as cellulases, are enzymes that hydrolyze cellulose and cellulose derivatives into glucose, cellobiose, cellooligosaccharides, and the like. Cellulases are enzymes that are produced and excreted extracellularly in several filamentous fungi and bacteria. These various cellulases then work synergistically and collaborate in the digestive system of fungi and bacteria to accomplish cellulose-type biomass conversion. Cellulases from fungi have traditionally been classified into three major classes: endoglucanases (EC 3.2.1.4) which attack the ends of cellulose chains, cellobiohydrolases (EC 3.2.1.91) which attack the β -(1 \rightarrow 4) linkages in the cellulose chain, and β -glucosidases (EC 3.2.1.21) that hydrolyze disaccharides. The cellulases produced by these fungi have a variety of applications. Cellulase from Trichoderma reesei has been extensively studied for its application in biomass conversion, particularly in the conversion of cellulose to ethanol. Cellulases from Trichoderma and other fungi have also been shown to have applications in detergent, e.g., by aiding in the degradation of waste-biofilm and cellulose-containing fabrics. Also, the hydrolytic product obtained from the hydrolysis of cellulose by cellulase is useful in the food industry as a digestibility improvement ingredient. However, the characteristics of this particular enzyme can be greatly improved. As we know now, the main enzymes used in hydrolysis of the actual plant material for bioethanol production are cellulases which are mainly β -glucosidases and β -glucosidases. The use of cellulases leads to degradation of cellulose to glucose and further to fermentable
