I noticed some points in my functions that I'm not sure whether these are bugs or not, or I'm doing it wrong. I tried to create a simple test: 1. Create a custom button in the form that creates a custom frame. 2. Create two event handlers: a. when "mouse down" the "cancel" event handler for the new frame and the form. b. when "mouse up" the "ok" event handler for the new frame and the form. 3. Event handler "cancel" try to replace the active control with the new frame and the form. 4. Event handler "ok" try to remove the new frame and the form. You can see my example here. A: The best solution for the problem is to use CButtonEvents. Because the default event filter is not good enough. You'll see the following message in the Immediate window: Object references are not valid as criteria for instance-level members or property usages. By default (double-clicking on the form), the control is handled by the default event handler, that leads to the error. You can also use an event filter to catch the events. But, in your case, it will be better to use the CButtonEvents class (and the CButtonEvents.Filter property). I always use a simple EventFilter. CButtonEvents filter Option Strict Off Option Infer On Option Explicit On Public WithEvents CancelButton As CButtonEvents Private Sub CancelButton_MouseDown(ByVal Button As Object, ByVal Key As Keys, ByVal Shift As Byte, ByVal X As Single, ByVal Y As Single) If (Me.Left = 0) Then MsgBox "CancelButton pressed!" End If End Sub Public Sub ButtonOk_Click() Me.Left = 0 Me.Top = 0 Me.Parent.WindowState = FormWindowState.Normal

In addition, there was no significant difference in the peak CRP levels between the two groups. The pathology of PR included neutrophilic vasculitis and neutrophilic infiltration. Granulocytes have multiple functions, including the secretion of chemical mediators and the formation of reactive oxygen species. In this study, the plasma concentrations of the elastase, a major neutral protease of neutrophils, were higher in the PR group than in the NR group. The implication of the higher level of the plasma elastase in the pathogenesis of PR is unclear; however, the plasma elastase levels are increased in sepsis and several inflammatory disorders. Previous studies have suggested that the genetic or autoimmune nature of PR may be related to the disease entity.[@R12]--[@R14] As an autoimmune disorder, PR is classified into three subtypes: granulomatous, necrotising and organising. In the present study, granulomatous and organising types were predominant in the PR group. Immunopathological findings in other studies have suggested that PR is a Th1-related disorder,[@R14] and a similar mechanism
