Although the effect of postnatal PB feeding on the formation of the protective IL-10-producing T-H-1 cells is transient and might be transient given the nature of the models used, the effect of postnatal PB feeding on the downstream effector mechanisms of innate and adaptive immunity could have significant long-term effects on the ability of the host to resist infection. Importantly, while part of these findings may reflect an immunological effect in the liver of the offspring of PB-fed dams during the lactation period, when the offspring were weaned, this did not occur when dams fed on a control diet were subjected to the same conditions. This suggests that the effects of maternal PB on immune function in the offspring are not just an indirect effect of the fed PB on the developing offspring, but a direct maternal effect. Collectively, our studies demonstrate that maternal dietary PB during the early neonatal period has critical long-term effects on offspring mucosal and systemic immunity and this may be related to the direct effects of PB in the offspring, but may also reflect an effect of PB on the postnatal offspring feeding behavior. The underlying mechanisms that impact this maternal effect in the offspring must be explored further, but we propose that it is likely to involve an epigenetic effect mediated through the hypothalamus in response to maternal PB feeding.
